Dosimetric, interobserver, and intraobserver studies of biliary lithotripsy catheters in phantom and clinical liver. Bile ducts are the route of most biliary stones. Bile duct stone obstruction is a major risk factor for gallstone formation. Endoscopic papillary balloon dilatation (EPBD), papillotomy, and stone extraction are the accepted endoscopic therapies for large biliary stones. However, the use of bile duct lithotripsy catheters is an effective alternative method for large biliary stones. We evaluated the use of bile duct lithotripsy catheters in phantom models and analyzed the results of our studies in patients. We modeled lithotripsy therapy of 11 stones in 5 models with bile, saline, and H2O as targets. In another study, 13 stones in 6 patients were examined and were evaluated according to technical parameters and the results of fragment evaluation. In lithotripsy therapy, saline is completely destroyed. H2O is decomposed by heat generated by the lithium-titanium alloy and is destroyed after 6 minutes. Saline and H2O have different interactions with targets. Lithium-titanium alloy is 50% effective in destroying H2O. Lithotripsy efficiency is proportional to the strength
